بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم

Contagion of Failed Campaigns

Hardly a day passes without hearing about new military campaigns launched by the armies and forces of the kafir and murtadd governments in the wilayat and areas where the soldiers of the Islamic State practice the worship of jihad for the sake of Allah. These armies and governments have forgotten or forced themselves to forget that they had previously declared the final victory over the mujahidin. For this, the statements were forged and the days of celebrations and holidays were dedicated!

In Iraq, for example, the Rafida government launched, over the past weeks and months, dozens of military and security campaigns targeting what it describes as "hideouts and shelters" of the mujahidin. It was accompanied by hundreds of army and police companies and murtadd militias, with air participation from their warplanes, and direct and indirect support from the Crusader forces. And their convoys became like locust swarms wandering around every mountain and valley. Their websites did not stop publishing pictures, news, and movements of these campaigns. Then, what was the result on the ground? A major security and military failure. Perhaps some of its features appeared in the recent campaign on the Makhmur mountains and Hamrin hills, which they did not find pictures to show about the "achievements" they claimed.

They returned to digging through their miserable archives, hoping that they might find in them the lies of their leaders, who went to extremes in spreading false statements. Their officers and soldiers also exaggerated in taking faded showing off photos in front of the hay piles in the orchards.

On the other hand, these constantly failing Rafidi campaigns continue to drain the treasury of their government, causing the exhaustion of their forces and militias, which are lost in the depths of deserts and valleys. These campaigns are nothing but evidence of what the mujahidin have previously asserted about the falsity of the "victory" declared by the Rafida government and the Crusaders. And the mujahidin responded to them at that time by saying: "Can a victorious one launch campaign after campaign?"

The contagion of failed campaigns was not limited to the Rafida in Iraq only, as other campaigns were launched by the army and the Nusayri militias, with the support and participation of the Russian Crusader forces in the desert of Sham. This desert has turned into other Anbar, where they are lost and their convoys and vehicles disappear, and all praise is due to Allah. And their soldiers felt unsafe walking on the countryside roads in Homs and Hama except under the cover of helicopters.

Among the latest news of the failed campaigns of the enemies of the Islamic State, is the campaign launched by the murtadd Puntland government forces against the mujahidin positions in Somalia Wilayah, and the heavy loss suffered by these forces at the hands of the mujahidin, by the grace of Allah. What is also interesting about this campaign was the size of the great lies that accompanied it and the allegations of the murtadd government, which the mujahidin refuted in their reports. Lying was one of the most obvious symptoms of this contagion, and its size is directly proportional to the severity of the contagion! This is common in all of these campaigns.

And before that, the failed campaign launched by the murtadd Nigerian army against the mujahidin areas in the forests of Alagarno, for which it mobilized what it had not mobilized in its previous campaigns. Nevertheless, the mujahidin, all praise is due to Allah, were able to repel their campaign, thwart it and inflict heavy losses on them.

The contagion of failed campaigns has afflicted all the armies fighting the Islamic State. Their faltering campaigns became an opportunity for the mujahidin to intensify their attrition to these armies, and even turn them against them.

Perhaps the whole world has seen what happened in Mozambique after the recent campaigns that the Mozambican army and its African allies had launched against the mujahidin of the Islamic State in the regions of northeastern Mozambique during the previous period. And how the mujahidin were able to absorb the campaigns and turn the tables on the heads of the Crusaders on the day the world woke up to the news of the mujahidin invasion of the economic city of Palma. And how this attack shocked the Crusader governments, who were babbling through their media and lamenting their luck when they saw that the seeds of the Khilafah they fought in Iraq and the Sham had borne fruit in Central Africa. And that the money they spent, the armies that they mobilized, the parties that they organized, and the alliances that they established, did not achieve anything for them except heartbreak, as Allah Almighty told us: "They will spend it, then it will become an anguish for them, then they will be conquered" (Al-Anfal: 36).

Today, the Crusaders are faced with only two options:

To start forming a "new international coalition" and gather for it many times the funding, capabilities, and armies they had gathered for their previous alliance, which ended up torn apart, divided politically, and a military consumed confined in some of its military bases. At a time when the countries of this alliance are busy trying to restore their home and fix their economic crises, internal problems and social calamities that are still in their start.

The second option is to support the governments and militias loyal to them to fight on their behalf against the Islamic State. They have tried this option several times before and reaped its bitter fruit. They did not wake up except for the Khilafah soldiers to conquer Mosul, Raqqa, Tadmur, Sirte, and other places and announce the establishment of the Islamic State that changed the course of the world forever.

As for the soldiers of the Khilafah, these campaigns increased them only with insistence and determination to move forward on the path of their blessed jihad. How not, when they see with their own eyes the protection of Allah Almighty and His support for them, and the harm Allah Almighty does to their enemies.

These failed campaigns also gave them more opportunities to further plunge their enemies into a cycle of attrition that is increasing day after day. To the extent that one or two bullets destroying a thermal camera on the outskirts of Diyala or north of Baghdad, can lure an entire army of the herds of Rafida and their militias towards traps and ambushes. And a single bomb exploding in the countryside of Khayr, Raqqah, or Barakah is capable of engaging entire groups of murtaddin in campaigns searching for mirages.

The contagion of the failed campaigns has exhausted the armies and governments of kufr and drowned them in seas of attrition, which they have no choice but to continue to drown more and more until they are finished, or to stop and leave the arena for the mujahidin to redraw the world's map upon the prophetic methodology. It is the goal that the mujahidin will never deviate from, by the permission of Allah.